WELL, BARNEY, AT IT AGAIN, I SEE!

RIGHT, FRED, AND THIS TIME I THINK I'VE INVENTED SOMETHING THAT WILL REALLY WORK.

OH, YEAH? AND JUST WHAT IS IT SUPPOSED TO DO?

OH I DON'T THINK YOU'D BE INTERESTED, FRED.

A Flintstone Funny

"This job sounds like one of the most important ones of my career!" mused Perry happily, arriving at the mansion of the Plentryrocks, richest people in town.

He rang the bell and then doublechecked his equipment. "Gun . . . flashlight . . . rope . . . handcuffs! They want me to guard their most precious possession. It's probably a family heirloom or some fabulous jewel, and I want to be ready for anything!"

Mrs. Plentryrocks opened the door.

"Morning, ma'am. I'm Perry Gunnite!" said Perry importantly. "I am here to guard your most precious possession!"

"Come right in!" said Mrs. Plentryrocks. "He's right behind you! Say hello to Mr. Gunnite, Junior!"

"Er — Junior?" said Perry, puzzled. Then he turned and got a face full of water from a toy pistol in the hands of a small boy.

"He likes you," gushed Mrs. Plentryrocks. "I know you two will get along just fine while we're gone for the weekend!"

Then it dawned on Perry. "But, Ma'am," he said, "I didn't know I was going to be a baby-sitter!"

"Baby-sitter!" sniffed Mrs. Plentryrocks. "I prefer the term bodyguard! After all, Junior is the wealthiest boy in Bedrock!"

"Yes, uh, bodyguard!" said Perry humbly.

After the Plentryrocks had gone, Perry asked Junior what he wanted to do. This was a dreadful mistake.

"Play horsey!" he shouted. "And you can be the horse!"

So Junior climbed on Perry's back and away they went — through the living room, the dining room, kitchen, ten bedrooms, the den, and back again.

"Faster! Faster!" shouted Junior as he whacked Perry to urge him on. At length he tired of this and jumped off. Poor Perry groaned as he straightened up. "I've heard of riders who couldn't sit down after a hard day in the saddle, but I never thought the horse wouldn't be able to sit, either!"

Next came baseball, with Perry pitching. "How can I get hurt if I keep my eye on the ball?" he thought. But he didn't reckon with Junior, who swung and let go of the bat which put a new part in Perry's hair!

Perry then thought tennis might be safer, but changed his mind when Junior's racket put a dent in his nose.

Still being a good sport, Perry figured foolishly that nothing could go wrong with ping pong. However, he soon realized how wrong he was when he opened his mouth at the wrong time and a fast serve from Junior lodged the ball roundly in Perry's mouth!

Perry had always prided himself on being ready for any emergency that might arise, but now he realized how sadly unprepared he was for this one.

There was only one thing to do if he hoped to survive the weekend. He excused himself from Junior, saying he had to make a phone call. He'd forgotten to bring an extremely important piece of equipment.

"Make it fast!" said Junior. "We've got some football to play!"

Perry called a friend of his who worked at the Bedrock Museum, stressing that this was an emergency of the direst sort.

About ten tackles and forty bruises later, Perry welcomed his friend with the emergency equipment — a full suit of armor!

"Hey, what's that for?" Junior asked.

"Well, Junior," replied Perry, slipping on the armor with a sigh of relief, "I've learned one thing from all this — even a bodyguard needs a body guard!"
